Future Wood Needs: Can The South Save The Nation?

ATLANTA, GA - Forestry experts fear a wood shortage if the available land to grow trees continues to shrink.

Southern Forest Institute President J. Greeley McGowin II says the South will have to produce 50 percent of the nation's wood needs in the next 25 years, compared to the present 30 percent. He said, "the nation faces a steadily decreasing land base - the results of expanding cities, roads, and recreation areas."

McGowin says the South's forests can meet the challenge with good management. He added that the largest problem, however, is "the non-industrial, private landowner -- the little man who owns three out of every four acres of commercial forest lands in the South." That's about 2,000,000 landowners.

McGowin says that most individual landowners aren't managing their woodlands to maximum productivity, and in many cases aren't replanting after a tree harvest. A recent U.S. Forest Service survey of six Southeastern states reveals an average loss of 500,000 acres of pine forests every year because of improper reforestation after harvest.

"If the landowner thinks his trees will grow back all by themselves after they're harvested, he needs to understand more about forest management," added McGowin. "If he fears that harvesting will be unsightly and destructive to his land; if he thinks managed forests are counter-productive to his desires for recreation, wildlife and beauty, we must show him how he can produce timber and enjoy income without sacrificing those other things that are important to him."

McGowin also calls on State & Federal governments to come up with improved cost-share programs and tax incentives to encourage landowners to begin "tree farming." Industry already supports the American Tree Farm System to stimulate interest in improving forest management.

About 20,000 Tree Farmers in the South have benefited through higher productivity added the SFI President. "If every woodland owner would look into the American Tree Farm Program or other forest-management programs offered by industry or government. America wouldn't have to worry about a wood shortage." McGowin pointed out that industry and government lands are typically well-managed, but together they own only a fourth of the South's forest.

He concluded, "We have the land base to get the job done in the South -- some 204,000,000 acres. We have the technical know-how. If we don't get our unsightly and destructive to his land; if he thinks managed forests are counter-productive to his desires for recreation, wildlife and beauty, we must show him how he can produce timber and enjoy income without sacrificing those other things that are important to him."

Food Poisoning

Everyone needs to know about bacteria which live and grow in food. Some of these bacteria can cause serious illness.

Salmonella causes a flu-type illness after eating food contaminated by unwashed hands, flies, or raw meats and poultry.

Staphylococci grow in food such as creamed foods that have not been adequately refrigerated. Some symptoms are diarrhea, vomiting, and weakness that can last for several days.

Clostridium botulinum may cause headache, double vision, respiratory failure, and death. This organism is most often found in improperly processed canned foods, especially home-canned foods. Any container that seems to contain gas or shows bubbles, or is swollen should be discarded unopened.

To prevent food poisoning:

1. Buy only canned food that has no rusted or dented areas, which may allow bacteria to enter.
2. When buying frozen foods purchase only foods that are frozen solid. Never purchase partially thawed frozen foods or foods that have been frozen, thawed and refrozen.
3. Observe cleanliness in food preparation. Wash cooking utensils in hot soapy water, rinse in clear water, and air dry. Clean can openers along with other utensils.
4. Always wash hands before preparing or handling food.
5. Keep all foods covered to keep out contaminates.
6. If food looks or smells bad, don't use it.

Food poisoning may not be recognized until the food is eaten and absorbed. Precaution is needed to prevent these bacteria from making you and your family very ill.
